Reminiscences of the Second Tennessee Cavalry.

BY JNO. W. ANDES.
NO. III.

Our last left us, on the morning of the 21st of October, 1862, on the summit of Cumberland Mountains, with hearts, taking a last fond look at the homes we had left behind us, many of us never to look upon them again. We numbered them upwards of 400 men, many of whom were destitute of money, rations and everything else except the scanty clothing upon their persons. Views as to the future were exchanged. Loved ones at home were spoken of, and tears of sadness and deep sorrow were shed. But no time was to be lost, and soon we commenced the descent of the mountain, which brought us to Yellow Springs, in Kentucky. The country was sparsely populated, and the stern realities of war had made those who were there wild as deer.

On the 24th we started out of the mountains. Snow commenced falling and continued until the night of the next day, at which time we arrived at London, a small town, the county site of Laurel county, Kentucky. The weather was bitterly cold, and many of our men were without coats, hats or shoes. Blood ran freely from their bruised and frozen feet. But courage, fortitude and patriotism caused them to persevere and struggle on. The country was in a destitute condition, Bragg's army having fallen back over that road, and taken everything in the shape of provisions for man or beast. Just previous to this, Buell's army had also retreated toward the Ohio River over this route. Famine stared the people in the face. We passed an uncomfortable night in London, the mercenary was about the streets above zero. We passed on by way of Crab Orchard, Lancaster, Franklin and Nicholasville to Lexington. At this place there were several thousand Union troops. By this time we were filthy, ragged and worn out, having been out about fifteen days. We were first taken for Confederate prisoners, and this mistake contributed to our relief, as the ladies of Lexington with Southern sympathies furnished us as we passed through the streets, with something to eat almost every house.

We were furnished transportation from here over the railroad to Covington, where we remained until Nov. 4th. Here we drew our clothing and doctored the blue. The hardships of our trip through Kentucky can not be described. They were equal to anything we endured throughout the war, and some of us were prepared for it. Some of us had money while many had none. The money we had, mostly Bank of Tennessee, was uncurrent and comparatively of little value, for practical purposes not worth the paper it was printed upon. In some localities there was nothing in the shape of provisions to be had, even if we had had money. We also suffered for water, as there was a remarkable scarcity of it, and little running water in that portion of Kentucky through which we travelled. On one occasion, after we had gone into camp, a venerable looking old man, who seemed to be a native of the place, came to our tent. He was old and poor, but the men seemed to relish him, even without food for seasoning. Most of the men were in a hurry to get the quality of the new and white "rate." Next day quite a number of them were sick.

When we divested ourselves of our old clothing and doctored the blue, the contrast was great. The next morning many of the men did not know each other. Here our pilot, Mr. Brown, returned to Tennessee, and by him we had an opportunity to send letters home, which he gladly awaited. One of the best letters home we had of sending letters home. I gave him one dollar in Tennessee money to bring my father and mother a letter. Others did the same, and he carried hundreds of letters to their homes. He was read with thrilling interest, and carried tidings of joy to some and sadness to others.

During our stay at Covington we were visited by hundreds of people anxious to hear from East Tennessee. Among them were Mrs. W. G. Brown and two of her daughters, then temporarily residing in Covington, gave us a pleasant call, and spoke earnest words of encouragement. We crossed the river here and came to the mouth of the Tennessee, where we joined our regiment, then commanded by Col. D. M. Ray. While on board the boat, before starting, we were visited by Governor Brownlow. He was caught by a cold, and the men were asked, but it became noised around that he was there, and he was greeted with shouts of welcome. He was called upon for a speech, but he was too unwell to speak. He, however, addressed us in a few words of encouragement, which cheered us up amazingly.

We remained at Bowling Green until November 4th, when we were sent back to Chattanooga and on to Louisville, where we arrived on the 14th. Here we drew our horses and equipments. The measles broke out in the regiment, and, owing to exposure, several died. On the 13th of December we started to Nashville by way of Elizabethtown and Bowling Green, arriving at Nashville on the 24th, just on the eve of the battle of Stone River, in which our regiment took part, and to which my next will be principally devoted.
